My Husband's Wives, written by Faith Hogan, is both a heartbreaking and heartwarming story about four women brought together under a very difficult circumstances. This is the first book that I have read by Faith Hogan, but it won't be my last. The author definitely knows how to tell a story, and you instantly become immersed in the lives of these four women. She literally brings the story to life, with compelling characters and an unusual, but engaging plot. Paul Starr lives in Ireland, and is a famous cardiologist. People think they know him, but soon find out that they never really knew him at all. The truth is revealed after he dies in a car crash, with a young, pregnant woman in the passenger seat. Four different women, all come together after Paul's death, and all of them are grieving for the same man. Through their common grief, the women begin to bond with one another, and finally learn what was true, and what was a lie. Evie is older than Paul, and was his first wife. He left Evie once he met an artist, Grace, who he also ended up marrying. Grace and Paul had one child, a daughter named Delilah. Of course, once that relationship went south, he moved on to the former beauty queen, Annalise, and had two children with her. Kasia is the pregnant mystery woman in the car with Paul when he died. None of Paul's wives realized he never got a divorce from the previous wife. As they begin their unlikely friendships, secrets are revealed about Paul that come as a total surprise to the women. I thought the whole concept was fascinating, and was brilliantly written and executed. The author lets each woman tell her story, and through each voice it then lends insight into each relationship Paul had.
